The Courage to Be Delulu

Have you ever paused and wondered where everything changed?
When did we stop dreaming fearlessly?
When did the world convince us to trade wild imagination for quiet survival?
Sometimes I look at myself and ask — Is this the life I once pictured? Or did I slowly start settling without noticing?

We grow up believing we're meant for something extraordinary. We make promises to our younger selves — that we'll conquer, we'll stand out, we'll make it. And then somewhere between expectations and reality, we learn to shrink. We call it maturity, but maybe… maybe it's just surrender disguised as wisdom.
This adulting is hitting — yet I still love that childish side that believed everything was possible.

And then one day, everything halts — a moment so still, it shakes you awake.
You look back and you see that old version of you, the one who believed without evidence, who dreamed without limits, who held destiny like fire in their hands — the one everyone laughed at and called 'DELULU'.

But here's the twist — that version wasn't foolish.
They were fearless.

And today, I choose to return to them.

I'm done fitting into quiet spaces.
I'm done folding myself smaller.
I'm done walking paths that don't belong to me.

From now, I'm building the life I once imagined - loudly, wildly, unapologetically.

Maybe being delulu isn't madness.
Maybe it's the beginning of blooming — and this time, I'm ready to shine.

— VINEETHA NADELLA